Introduction

- - - - -

¶1. (C) Conflict continued in the Malakand division - particularly in Swat, where the number of apparent revenge killings of militants doubled in relation to the previous reporting period. The Pakistani government obtained considerable favorable publicity for the activities of two small lashkars raised in Sultanwas (the former militant headquarters in Buner) and the Qalagay and Totano Bandai union councils of Swat (on the border with Lower Dir). These lashkars' activities have been relatively minimal, but they provide a local face for the anti-militant effort - important given the reluctance of local leaders to return to Swat (ref B). In Shangla, violence in the Puran tehsil rose significantly, as security forces clashed with militants (who had killed a local anti-militant leader during the previous reporting period).

¶2. (C) In North and especially South Waziristan, operations by the Pakistani military continued to be minimal, lending credence to rumors that the government was pursuing negotiations with Baitullah Mehsud. Initial reports indicated that Baitullah had been targeted in an explosion that killed his wife on August 5; later reports appeared to confirm his death in that explosion (ref A). In close-by Lakki Marwat, an operation to clear out militants from the village of Sultan Hasankhel stretched into its third week.

¶3. (C) On August 2, police in Saidu Sharif charged Tehrik-i-Nifaz-i-Shariat-i-Mohammadi (TNSM) leader Sufi Mohammed, arrested in the previous reporting period, with treason. These charges, which carry the death sentence upon conviction, signaled the provincial government's disinclination to again use Sufi Mohammad as an intermediary in negotiations with top Malakand militant leaders such as Fazlullah, as it had reportedly been pressured to do by the intelligence services (ref C).

¶4. (SBU) An August 1 raid on a Mardan-area mosque hosting an illegal radio transmitter underlined the extent to which illegal FM radio stations were now operating in Mardan. Local press described the alleged activities of two Mardan-area mullahs broadcasting on illegal FM stations. One, Maulavi Ikramullah, regularly preached against shops that stayed open on Friday, warning of reprisals by the militants for whom he claimed to speak. The other, Maulavi Malakpuri, allegedly led a gang of 60-70 militants who enforced Malakpuri's calls for taliban-compliant moral behavior by local merchants.
